Dear Sir,

As an elementary school teacher and mother of two, I thought your recent article on children and TV was very interesting. However, my views on the subject 51 those of the writer.

For years, newspaper columnists and other so-called experts have criticized TV programs. Often, they don't think about television as a 52 learning tool. I've used TV in my classroom for years, and it has helped make learning a much more interesting experience for my young students.

In my view, TV can be anti-violence and pro-learning. When used in the right way, it can even 53 the learning process. I use TV programs to teach geography, science, and even reading—and my students' higher test scores prove that this strategy is 54. Both my children grew up watching TV shows like Sesame Street and they are now among the top students in their school. These types of programs help students learn basic 55 skills like the alphabet, and how to count. They can also teach children things like sharing and environmental awareness.

I think it's time to stop criticizing TV, and focus on its amazing potential for practical and constructive learning.
