四、閱讀測驗

Everyone loves money! But do you know where money originally came from? Who were the first people to use money? Scientists say that over 10,000 years ago, people in Swaziland, Southern Africa, were using red dye as a type of money. The aboriginal people of Australia were also using a similar dye as a type of money around that period of time. Later, people in several places used shells and other valuable things as a type of money to "buy" or "trade for" things they wanted. This is known as a barter system, a form of trade where some goods are exchanged for other goods.

Many things have been used as "money" from pigs to spices and salt. For a long time, pepper could be used to "pay for" things in Europe. On the Micronesian island of Yap, people used very big stone "coins," some of which were up to eight feet wide and weighed more than a small car.

But the most convenient forms of money were pieces of valuable metals like gold and silver. Historians think that the Lydians were the first people to introduce the use of gold and silver coins around 650 BC. Gold and silver are still quite valuable today.

The first banknotes appeared in China in the 7th century, and the first banknotes in Europe were issued in 1661.

Money has changed through the ages. However, it is more important today than ever before.
